Jennifer,

Okay, here is the deal.

If you would like to know what I was trying to say to your family, just let me know and I'll send you a copy of the letter. All I did was introduce myself and say thank you for all of the wonderful things they have done for you and Emmie. How can that be wrong?

I only did this because it was the proper thing to do and because you stopped responding to me all together. I had no choice. I am confident that there was nothing wrong with this and I wanted nothing more than to get you and your family's approval and blessing in this manner. It took a lot of courage for me to do this not knowing what you have told them (or not told them). If this is a problem, then obviously you aren't being honest with me. I am Emmie's father and you want to hide that from them for some reason. You told me they had known since Emmie was 3 months old.

How can you tell me that I should have sent things to Emmie at your parents house years ago, but I can't even send a nice letter to your parents now? I never even knew where Emmie lived and that she wasn't with you back then.

You are going completely overboard with this nonsense about "other" men claiming to be Emmie's daddy or that you do not know who is the father all of a sudden. Shall I send you back your first email where you tell me that "Emmie does that yucky thing with her elbow like you and Courtney"? What about our conversation just 3 days ago? What about telling me that I was the only person that you ever had an affair with? What about telling me that the video showed you how deeply you were in love with me and that you were pregnant when it was filmed? If you are having a hard time dealing with all of this then why are you hiding from it and trying to push me away? Just tell me the truth about what your parents really know or why you are doing this and I'll work with you. What are you afraid of? Did your family put you up to this? If so, why?

I am willing to be there for you and try to understand what has caused you such pain. You were opening up and telling me and then you shut me out and cut me off. I can't take this. Nothing will cause me to change my caring about knowing Emmie.

I hope we can be friends, contact me when you calm down....I'm worried about you.

Always,
Derrel

P.S. Just ask and I'll send you the letter....maybe then you'll see you are freaking out about nothing. All is fine.
